Working abroad

More and more international companies are sending their employees to work abroad. While most people welcome the opportunity to experience life abroad, few are prepared for the culture shock. When Polly Platt, an American, moved with her Austrian husband to Vienna, she had so many problems with the local customs that she often felt lost and disoriented. Now, thirty years later, Ms Platt is offering courses on cultural adjustment. People from different cultural backgrounds often interpret the same thing in different ways. If you are late for a business meeting in Germany, your business partner may find you unreliable. It is bad manners, in the eyes of many Germans, to approach business in a light-hearted way.

American executives always seem to run from one business meal to another. They hold meetings over breakfast, lunch and dinner. Europeans do not understand this custom at all.

In American companies teamwork is very important. Workers often put the team opinion before their personal opinion.
